Transferrins are a group of proteins that transport iron through the body in a similar manner. This includes participation in the transport of iron to the bone marrow and blood, where it is stored, and from the blood to the cells. Transferrin contains iron-binding sites of high affinity for its iron-binding donor (either the low affinity and the high affinity sites). Functions of Transferrin: It regulates erythropoiesis by controlling the iron stores available to the bone marrow in vivo. A rise in transferrin levels will stimulate the bone marrow to increase its production of red blood cells. 3da54e8ca3
